

Pros and Cons to Grade Mode of CR/NC During COVID-19 EMERGENCY MEASURES

NOTE: A CR is equivalent to a C for many purposes

Pros	Cons
Pros Changing your grade mode to CR/NC is beneficial if: • You are worried about food and housing and cannot concentrate on school • You think it may take five or six weeks to start doing well with online coursework • Your current grade is not up to standard • You want to alleviate stress by not worrying about getting a letter grade • You are juggling family demands and it is taking priority over school work	Cons Some of the cons for changing your grade mode to CR/NC include: • You may have an A or B which is better than what a CR reflects • You can opt-in to CR/NC until May 21 at 4 p.m. and trying for a good letter grade will keep you motivated • You want to boost your cumulative GPA • Moving to CR/NC might make you less motivated to perform your best • Strong letter grades will support applications to graduate and professional
 You want to use CR/NC on general education requirements, so that you can focus on letter grades in classes for your major. A grade of CR will satisfy the minimum pre-requisite of "C" and above. You want to use CR/NC for a tough course to alleviate stress You are working more hours due to COVID-19 and spending less time focusing on classes You don't want to raise your cumulative GPA this semester; CR/NC has no impact on your cumulative GPA. The motivation to earn a high grade this semester is lacking 	 schools Health science pre-majors and majors discourage grades of CR Letter grades of C-, D+, D, and D- still carry credit. In CR/NC grade mode, these grades are considered NC and you will earn zero credit hours. Getting a letter grade for classes in your major or minor might be better For graduate students, CR/NC grades may affect assistantships, which require a letter grade. External merit scholarships (non-UNM), assistantships, funding, etc. might still require a letter grade. A CR/NC may not be substituted. CR/NC in Spring 2020 does not have a negative impact on UNM financial aid.
